Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from John Angelo: At the Water Color Exhibition They were studio children, born amongst easels and palettes, lay-figures and model-stands, and reared on high art along with their oatmeal and milk. It was an old tradition that the first words spoken by John Angelo in recognizable English were uttered by the baby toddler before his father s largest canvas. The mite had assumed the attitude of a connoisseur, and with dimpled fingers, crooked to represent an eye-glass, he squinted at the painting, and remarked patronizingly to his father, Not bad! Since then John Angelo had grown into a bewitching boy of eight or nine years, with blonde hair banged above his dreamy blue eyes, a poetic and sensitive nature, and an extremely picturesque black-velvet suit, with Vandyke collar of Irish point. John Angelo s dearest friend was another boy of about his own age, also an artist s son, but of most pronouncedly commonplace appearance. In his pepper-and-salt suit, with his bristling, electrical hair, which no amount of brushing would make lie smoothly, and from his good-humored but homely face, no one would have suspected that an artist s heart beat in Teddy Landseer s sturdy little breast. Teddy Landseer loved roller-skating in the square, and all the other rough sports of healthy boys. He was not too aristocratic to sit down on the curbstone and play at marbles with Chew Gum, the son of the Chinese laundryman, yet he had a chivalrous heart, and was gentle to little girls, and to all weak and loving things.
