Not illustrated. 1894 Excerpt: . . . tank was supplied with water at a temperature of 155 and when everything was ready the melted wax was poured into the tank and sufficient of it dipped to supply two colonies. The resulting sheets were made into foundation with the Given press and fitted into the frames of two lives and on the 20th of July a colony of bees was put into one of them and on the 25th one was put into the other. The last was rather a weak colony and a little later superseded its queen so that it worked out only about one-half the foundation, while the other one made use of nearly all its foundation. At different times the colonies were examined for foul brood, but no sign of it was found till the 8th of October when nearly all brood being hatched out a thorough examination was made and a single cell of apparently foul broody matter was found in each. This raises a very strong presumption, almost amounting to certainty, that the wax conveyed the disease but the hives will be watched another season for further developments. The method of curing foul brood heretofore recommended, and which I have Bo often proved effective, was tried again this year, upon a colony which was rather badly affected, with the usual satisfactory results. The method pursued will be found fully explained in a former report. It is a question of much interest whether a colony once affected with the...
