Guerrino held his peace, and continued to do so. The king repeated his question, with an un-called-for sternness, adding, Time flies, in a petulant and impatient tone. Sire, retorted Guerrino, did you not stipulate to give me the whole day for my wooing? and the sun has not yet set. Thus they remained in suspense, until the wasp made his appearance. In he came, busily humming about the room, and at length he went buzzing round the head of one of the princesses. She was afraid, and drove it away with her hand. Twice, thrice, the same action was repeated. Guerrino s time had come. Advancing to the princess who had thus been assailed, and laying his hand on her shoulder, he thus addressed the king: Sire, this is your daughter Golden Hair; and, .by God s bounty, my bride. Then she threw her veil aside, and all saw it was Potentia. So King Zifroy gave her up to Guerrino, and Eobinetto wooed and won the fair Silver Hair. When the king was told that Guerrino was of blood-royal, he was reconciled to the match, and the whole of merry Ireland danced with delight. Both weddings took place on the same day, and the bridal-feasting and merry-making lasted, --goodness knows how long. Guerrino thought it high time to acquaint his parents of his doings, especially as he believed his father s anger must by this time be assuaged. Imagine their...
