Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Extracts From Reports Upon Technical Details of Engineering Works, 1906, Vol. 23 The construction methods detailed in the technical report for 1905 for the traverse roofs of the 6-inch batteries have proved satisfactory. The only improvement made has been a provision for channel iron gutters in recesses in the magazine ceilings directly beneath the planes of weakness of the roof blocks. The exposed surfaces of all concrete blocks are now finished with the wood float only. When surfaces are trowelled smooth, a skin of cement is brought to the top. This has a larger coefficient of expansion than the concrete, and a network of disfiguring hair cracks is formed on the surface. Under certain conditions this skin may flake off. The waterproof pavements for the loading platforms described in page 3006 have proved satisfactory to date. When soft burned porous tile are kept saturated with water and exposed to alternate freezing and thawing under the severe conditions of the Maine climate, they are broken up. In the latest work, tile laid in positions subject to such exposure have been boiled in paraffine before placing. Each tile thus treated took up about one-half pound of paraffine, and subsequent tests showed that the treated tiles had become non-absorbent. In some of the older batteries the mass concrete of the traverses and parapets is very porous. In these cases annoying leaks are sometimes formed in the galleries below the waterproof pavements by water from the porous concrete entering the gallery roof supporting the pavement where this abuts against the mass. The water enters below the waterproofing and follows along the sides of the supporting I-beams for some distance...
